this article describes a method to calculate the stresses and crack widths at a midspan of the bridge at the design life. to do this, the stresses and crack widths at the end of the design life are calculated, these stresses and crack widths can then be interpolated to the design life so that the stresses and crack widths at the design life are calculated. the assumption is that the stress field at the design life is the same as that at the end of the life. the method used is called a new crack interpolation method which is based on the work of zhukovsky and baker (1988). this article describes a method to calculate the stresses and crack widths at the end of the life. the stresses and crack widths are calculated at the end of the life and used to interpolate to design life. this method is based on the work of fay (1973). the method used is called a new crack interpolation method which is based on the work of zhukovsky and baker (1988). the second design situation illustrates the calculation of stresses and crack widths at sls when some of the load is long term permanent load and the rest is instantaneous live load. the method used is an interpolation between the long and short term modulus so the stresses calculated are those that would occur at the end of the structure life. to check the stresses just after construction, the long term modulus would need to be modified, so as to represent the correct amount of creep, or the user can choose to use the short term modulus only. using nonvalid software is an act of copyright infringement, which may result in both civil and criminal penalties. further, autodesks terms of use requires all customers to use autodesk software in compliance with all applicable laws and further prohibits any act of unauthorized use, access or reproduction.
